- 5. Community Living Welland Pelham – Andrew Howcroft
- The following dialogue was taken from a podcast that can be found at, <https://goodthingsinlife.org/055/>.
 - Lisa Lightner, a special education advocate, and the mom behind the “Don’t IEP Alone” podcast is this week’s guest.

Genia: And so in your work as a special education advocate and the work that you do on your blog and the Don’t IEP Alone podcast what are you think right now? What do you think right now were some of the most important issues that parents of children with intellectual disabilities should be thinking about?

Lisa: One of the things that I really tried to communicate to parents is that only parents, you know, and if you've, if you have a direct advocate working with your family, only parents and advocates tend to look at the outcome and what's going to happen at age 18 or 21 or 25. The way that our school systems are designed is just that everybody looks September to May or September to June, whatever that school calendar might be. And teachers, and I love teachers, they tend to just prepare you for next, you know, they're preparing you for the next grade or the next year or the next school building. Nobody except for parents is really looking at that end goal of yeah, that next what, meaning adulthood. Yeah. Whole life and adulthood. What is that going to look like? And I think that the education community as a whole, you know, we love to look at how many kids went on to college and how many kids did this. But you know, we still have, at least here in the USA, we have an 80% unemployment rate for people with intellectual disabilities. And to me that's not acceptable. So, so obviously we're not focusing on outcomes.

Genia: Right. Or we're not succeeding in what we're doing.

Lisa: Right. And that the main thing like, yes, your plan for the right here and now is very important, but you always have to be looking at the end goal and the end result and what that child is going to do or what their life is going to look like as an adult.

Genia: Yeah. And it's sort of one of those like don't lose sight of the forest for the trees. And you had a podcast episode, it's not, it's not one of your newer episodes now. Actually it's a while ago, but I can't even remember what you said, but it had something to do with an elephant. Can you talk about that a little bit?

Lisa: Right. I heard a quote one time. And it's about standing too close to the elephant. And if you just envision that as far as if you're standing too close to the elephant, I think a lot of parents do that and they get too, one of my other advocates who, advocate friends who helps me, she calls it that they just fell in the hole. And it's kind of like you're just standing too close. You are too close to the situation. You've just fell in the hole and you can't get out and see the big picture.

Genia: Right. So you're just seeing the wrinkle in the elephant skin as opposed to actually being able to see the whole elephant or the whole being in front of you.

Lisa: Right. Exactly.

Genia: Yeah. And I think it's really it's too, it's almost to be expected that parents would have that experience because, you know, we, in the preschool years, we're often connected with a medical community and perhaps early childhood development both of which have very immediate sort of focuses, right? Like their goal is not necessarily seeing the whole elephant but you know, making sure whatever the medical concern is it is addressed and early childhood development is very much about those, you know, developmental goals and next step, next step, next step building on it. And they would both the medical establishment to some degree at least some people and certainly early childhood development programs would all say, well, we're doing that because you work towards the next step so that you are working towards a whole life. But that's not necessarily; the next step is not necessarily the whole big picture either. And then we get into the school system and the school's IEPs are by definition, like by the way they're broken down, are very much like specific next step kinds of things and developmental goals with no real attention to the big picture of who this child is and how they might be accessing the good things in life and you know, reaching their full potential and becoming a contributing citizen and all of those kinds of things.

Lisa: Correct. And I think the actual full proverb or saying is if you stand too close to the elephant, you can't see the elephant or you don't see the elephant. So yeah, that's just about, that's it. It's about focusing on one small piece of it rather than the big picture.

Genia: Yeah. And supposedly, if you stand too close to the elephant, you might get stepped on.

Lisa: True.
